Supplementary Information

Investigation into the stability of Li metal anodes in Li–O\textsubscript{2} batteries with a redox mediator

Seongmin Ha\textsuperscript{a,b}, Youngjin Kim\textsuperscript{a}, Dongho Koo\textsuperscript{a}, Kwang–Ho Ha\textsuperscript{a}, Yuwon Park\textsuperscript{a}, Dong–Min Kim\textsuperscript{a}, Samick Son\textsuperscript{c}, Taeun Yim\textsuperscript{d,} and Kyu Tae Lee\textsuperscript{a,}

\textsuperscript{a} School of Chemical and Biological Engineering, Institute of Chemical Processes, Seoul National University, 1 Gwanak–ro, 1 Gwanak–gu, Seoul 08826, Republic of Korea
\textsuperscript{b} School of Energy and Chemical Engineering, Ulsan National Institute of Science and Technology (UNIST), 50 UNIST–gil, Ulsan 44919, Republic of Korea
\textsuperscript{c} Environment and Energy Research Team, Division of Automotive Research and Development, Hyundai Motor Company, 37 Cheoldobangmulgwan–ro, Uiwang–si, Gyeonggi–do 16082, Republic of Korea
\textsuperscript{d} Department of Chemistry, Incheon National University, 119 Academy–ro, Yeonsu–gu, Incheon 22012, Republic of Korea

Corresponding authors
E–mail: (K. T. Lee) ktlee@snu.ac.kr, (T. Yim) yte0102@inu.ac.kr
Figure S1. Ex situ scanning electron microscope (SEM) images of the charged porous oxygen cathodes in the Li–O \textsubscript{2} cells (a) without 10–methylphenothiazine (MPT) and (b) with MPT after 10 cycles.